Medical Alert Systems

What you should know

As our population ages, more and more seniors are choosing to live alone. This independence is sometimes accompanied by the fear that in the event of an emergency no one will be there to help. One approach to addressing this concern has been the introduction of personal medical alert systems.

A medical alert system is designed to make it easy to quickly summon help during emergencies if the user is unable to reach a telephone. This might be after a fall, in the event of a fire or crime, or, if the user is disabled.

You can call for help by simply pushing a button.

How it works

A medical alert system has three components:

1. The Transmitters

The user may select either a wristband or pendant transmitter. When emergency help is needed, the user simply presses the button on the transmitter. It is waterproof and should be worn at all times. It has an unobstructed range of over 400'.

2. The Communicator

The communicator is somewhat like a large speaker-telephone. When the user presses the transmitter button, the communicator automatically dials the monitoring center and 2-way voice communication is established.

3. The Monitoring Center

When the call from the communicator is received at the monitoring center, an operator then speaks to the user directly over the communicator to determine the nature of the call (response time to answer the call averages about 45 seconds from activation).

If the user has an emergency, the operator will then contact local emergency personnel, a family member, and/or a neighbor. (Emergency contact information is gathered at the time of installation.)

Comparison shop

When shopping for a medical alert system, consider these suggestions:

- Check out several systems before deciding.
- Ask what the total cost is.
- Is the system installed & maintained locally?
- Is there an installation fee?
- Can service be discontinued at any time?
- Will the unit "capture the telephone line"?
- Does the unit have a battery back-up?
- Is monitoring 24 hours/day, 7 days/week?
- Ask what the response time is?
- Read the service agreement before signing.
- Test the system. Make sure it works from every point in and around the home.
